DIRECTOR'S NOTES

It was 37 years ago that Sweet Charity first stole my heart at the Prince of Wales Theatre. I'd just arrived in London to begin theatre school, and I fell in love with Charity at first sight. This show was my first exposure to Bob Fosse's choreography and, bolstered by an outstanding performance by Juliet Prowse, the show drew me back again just days later. The British public fell for Charity too, and the show ran for over a year in the West End.

Tonight's musical is translated to an American context by Neil Simon from a film about an aging Roman prostitute called Nights of Cabiria by Federico Fellini. Sweet Charity opened in 1966 at Broadway's Palace Theatre with four-time Tony winner Gwen Verdon as Charity. Directed and choreographed by Fosse, the production was nominated for 12 Tony Awards and ran for 608 performances. A film version followed in 1969 starring Shirley MacLaine. Sweet Charity was revived in 1986 with Debbie Allen in the lead and took 4 more Tonys, but, sadly, Fosse died shortly afterwards. A revival starring Christina Applegate – with revisions by Simon and a new Coleman/Fields song—is expected to open in April, 2005 following a pre-Broadway run in Minneapolis, Chicago and Boston.

The stylised fable of a "tart with a heart" has never lost its lustre to the passage of time. The show reflects themes of the 60's, including the clash of 1950's morality with emerging individualism. Fosse's overall conception and staging devices were innovative in their period, but the songs retain universal appeal. "Big Spender" and "If They Could See Me Now" remain among the most recognizable Broadway show-stopper tunes.

It's been great fun introducing a new generation of talented young students to the challenges and charms of Sweet Charity. Many thanks to choreographer Gillian Saunders-Herron, music director Christopher Mounteer, the cast and the entire technical production team for their skill and dedication in helping me recreate what I discovered all those years ago. Sit back and have some "fun...laughs...good times".
