Director’s Notes

The story of Floyd Collins in 1925 provided the backdrop for the first big media circus in the United States. It is a story of faith, family and the American Dream. The Post World War I agricultural depression of the early 1920s had many farming families struggling to survive. In Kentucky the locals fought to discover caves they could sell as tourist attractions. The cave closest to the road would attract the most business. This instigated the cave wars in which local “cappers” (they wore visored caps) were paid to deliver rerouted tourists to the smaller private caves. Thirty-seven-year old Floyd Collins had discovered Crystal Cave earlier in 1920 but it was the furthest cave from the main road. He was desperate to find a cave that was closer to the main tourist route. He discovered Sand Cave (which was the first cave on the Cave route) in January 1925 and became trapped in it. Within a week Floyd Collins was a household name. A truly American hero story – Floyd was a cave explorer, an entrepreneur, an adventurer and a businessman. He represents the American Dream that most citizens in 1925 couldn’t achieve. He was also a symbol for Americans who in 1925 felt “lost,” “stuck” or “trapped” in their lives despite their skills or ambitions. He was uneducated and grew up in the backwoods of Kentucky in a large family. In a desperate attempt to sell newspapers, most reporters disregarded the truth about Floyd and made up stories to sell papers. This makes his story still relevant today. In our present world of “alternative facts” we must ask the questions on a daily basis – what is the truth in the news? Only William Burke “Skeets” Miller provided authentic coverage of the story. Miller eventually won a Pulitzer Prize for his reporting on the Collin’s story. This musical examines the question of where is the humanity in the news stories we hear? Did we care about the human being – the man, or simply the fallen hero? There seems to be a mysterious force that propels people to pursue the American Dream while simultaneously celebrating and focusing on their crushed dreams.
